Compiler and interpreters

A compiler translates entire code before running, creating an executable file, while an interpreter translates code line by line during execution without creating a standalone file. Compilers are generally faster but have longer development cycles, while interpreters are slower but offer quicker feedback.